No Concern Over N.S.A., C.I.A. Link

New York—According to the National Student Association, collegians still support its travel division despite links to the Central Intelligence Agency.

James Glendinning, director of Educational Travel, Inc., affiliate of N. S. A. which runs tours and study programs around the world, said sales have risen in the past 2 weeks. He said the agency looks forward to a record year for student travel, with an increase of 20 percent in tour sales.

He contended the agency is nonprofit, self-supporting and separate corporation which, through its ties with N. S. A., is able to provide services to students.

Although there are no statistics available on North Jersey area collegians planning overseas trips under the N. S. A. program they seem unconcerned about C. I. A. ties.

"The students were quite amused over the situation," said Elia Efstratiou, Student Council president at Fairleigh Dickinson University. "But it didn't prompt the students to even discuss dropping our membership in the N. S. A."

The N. S. A. affiliation at the campus is in its seventh year. The Student Council is the official member, making every student in the university a member.

Efstratiou said that traveling is only one phase of the national program. "The school has received many benefits from membership," he said. "Just the leadership conferences alone has improved the school 200 percent."
